The Aeneid, Virgil's epic poem, is set in the 8th century BC and tells the story of the Trojan hero Aeneas who escapes from the ruins of Troy and founds the Roman nation in Italy.

The Aeneid is divided into 12 books and tells the story of Aeneas's journey from Troy to Italy, where he建立s the city of Rome.

The poem begins with Aeneas's departure from Troy and his voyage across the sea to the island of Carthage, where he meets Queen Dido, the daughter of King Pyrrhus.

In Carthage, Aeneas is warned by the god Venus to continue his journey to the west, where he will find a new home for the Trojans. He leaves Dido and his faithful friend, Giscardi, and sets sail for Italy.

As he nears the coast of Italy, Aeneas dreams of the founding of Rome and is encouraged by the gods to press on.

The poem then describes Aeneas's arrival in Italy and his journey through the land, where he encounters many adventures and meets several important figures, including King Latinus and Queen Lavinia.

Aeneas's journey eventually leads him to Carthage, where he is reunited with Dido and they decide to found a new city together. But their plans are interrupted by the arrival of the Greek hero Memnon, who has been sent by King Priam to fight against the Trojans.

The Aeneid ends with the death of Memnon and the founding of Carthage by Aeneas and Dido. It is a powerful poem that tells the story of one man's quest for a new home, and it has inspired generations of artists and writers ever since.

The Aeneid is one of the greatest works of Roman literature and remains a classic of Western literature.
