Brief history of the Greek myths

From the beginning of the Bronze Age to the end of the Middle Ages

By Ángela Benítez

The Greeks, in their unknown beginnings, and the Athenians, in their early years, imagined the gods as men who had been transformed much after the death of their parents. As a result of their deification, the gods became beings that could do anything, indeed, that did anything. Thus, the gods were not just individuals who acted upon the events of the world, but also islands of the sky and the sea. We can see this in the stories of Zeus, Poseidon, and Apollo, as well as in those of the other gods of the Olympian pantheon. These stories tell us that the gods were capable of doing almost anything, and that they could do it for any reason.

The Greeks also believed that the gods were powerful beings who could do anything they wanted. This is evident in the way that the gods were depicted in the myths. For example, in the story of the gods and the humans, we see that the gods could do anything they wanted, and that they could do it in any way they wanted. They could create anything they wanted, and they could destroy anything they wanted. They could also give life and take it away, and they could do it in any way they wanted. They could also give and take away any kind of wealth, and they could do it in any way they wanted.
